- What do I want to learn or understand better?

I want to know exactly what the minimum viable product is for our PO. As we are heading towards the last few sprints, knowing what we should prioritize feels extra important. Right now, we have a rather good sense of the MVP, but if we are to deliver something that our PO actually can use in the end, I think we have to prioritize even more. To get to this point, we just need to ask our PO and act accordingly after them, and not our own priorities.

- How can I help someone else, or the entire team, to learn something new?

I think that right now, in our team we have a good working environment. As I stated in my earlier reflections, I do not want the team to feel like we are competing against one another. I think we have succeeded in that regard and therefore we have an open forum for helping each other to learn new things. The situation is pretty much as I wanted it to be. So going forward the most important thing would be to try and keep this up.

- What is my contribution towards the team's use of Scrum?

I would say not anything in particular this week. This question in general I have much difficulties answering. But I would still say that I help with following the principles. I work with my stories and I take part of our meeting with the PO, sprint retrospective, sprint planning and so forth. These meetings are now running much more smoothly than in the beginning, which I think is a great group effort we have managed. Especially this week's sprint planning, everyone was involved and for me it generated a lot of energy. As stated previously, I wanted to get better at story writing. I think it has become much better, and therefore working with them in general is significantly easier. However, I still think we have a problem with overestimating the workload of stories. Mostly, I think it is because we work with things we have not done before and therefore overestimate the steepness of the learning curve. Maybe if we do some very quick research before estimating, we will realize it is actually not that difficult.

- What is my contribution towards the team's deliveries?

This week I think it was much better. I finished all the stories I was assigned, and unlike prior weeks, they were not too small or few. I feel I got quite a bit of work done this week, towards creating value for the customer, which feels great. Especially compared to last week where I got a bit disgruntled with my deliveries. However, I still think I have more to give during a sprint, that I can contribute even more. There was times during the week where I had the possibility to work, but my partner was not. So maybe for next week, I could try and take on a smaller story, just by myself, as I think it would make it easier for me to spend my time more efficiently than right now.
